City Centre, Stirling, Scotland
Stirling is a city and former Royal burgh in Scotland. The city stands around a fortress and mediæval old-town beside the River Forth. Historically it was strategically important as the "Gateway to the Highlands" because of its position near the boundary between the Scottish Lowlands and Highlands, and its crossing of the Forth nearest to the river's mouth.

"If the development is possible, it is out of our power to prevent it."

Edward Teller

Teller was responding to the assertion that the USA should forego development of a thermonuclear bomb, the "Super" or H-Bomb, because its lethality makes it immoral.

Teller said, in other words, that if something is possible, no one can prevent it from happening. Or, what can happen will happen.

... the English of which is, "S--- happens" ... and ... it behooves one to be prepared to deal with it before it happens, because it will happen.

Of course, preemption, such as is possible, even if in the end a forlorn effort, would be one reasonable way to deal with s--- before it happens.

The people who did this maintain it was moral and so do a lot of residents of New York and other cities:
